The diesel and the steaming engine power on the road from Czecin (Poland) to Moscow (Russia) with a load of logs to deliver to the new factory. Many thanks for the comment. This is indeed a false friend, and I had not seen this (they talked about the British Museum, which you can easily imagine being a big part of their visit). That said, I do take your point and it is a good one. This is a useful little piece of history. It's been around the block, but in the past it's been discovered by people who then had an interest in disseminating the information, which isn't necessarily the same as those who have an interest in discovering it. I was just fascinated by the way that people have learnt from these catalogs - they were able to find out the exact location of a photograph - so much so that they used the location as the basis for a later picture. All-too-often those discoveries are of people doing it simply as a game, without any sense of history. The fact that you found this out after doing a considerable amount of research is to be applauded, and makes for a good learning point. For the most part, I find that things people write online are "back in the day" writing. I'm old enough that I know what they were doing at the time they wrote their online comments, and the fact that they're interesting and still relevant is wonderful. I'm not suggesting we should all hang up our blogs, but I think I'd be quite tired if I was your age.

Q: How to show runtime table with one-to-many relationship in DDD I'm using DDD We have a Person entity with ID, Name and Role (noun, adjective, verb). The Person entity have 1 or more Messages (The role in messages is used for ordering the messages in the right order when the message stream is being sent) In the design I have on diagram below, the messages are persisted separately, each message to a different table.

How can I implement design (code) for showing runtime tables with the entity and its relationships? Is it possible to map the message table in some way with the person-message table? I'm curious about all the possible design choices available for this, and I'm a beginner to DDD. Thank you! A: First, what you are trying to
