PETERSBURG — School closures will be used to combat the spread of the Wuhan virus, but New Tampa School Superintendent Mark Stevenson said, "there is no plan to close any school within the district." The district has identified a handful of possible school closures in the event that the virus spreads to St. Petersburg. "For this reason, we will continue to closely monitor our situation," Stevenson said, adding that the district would move forward with the "precautionary and mitigation plans that we already have in place." The school board is scheduled to meet Thursday. Members of the district's health committee and a deputy superintendent have been working in concert with state and local health officials and academic leaders in developing a plan for should the virus become more widespread. "We have a plan in place should there be a need to close schools," said Dr. Mario Mejia, the district's deputy superintendent of school services. "Our plan is ready to go should the need arise." The health committee consists of the assistant superintendent of health services, the assistant superintendent of human resources, the assistant superintendent of learning and academic support, the superintendent of schools, the director of human resources and the director of communication. The district's plan is to close schools by Jan. 28 and reopen on Jan. 29. A news conference is scheduled for 2 p.m. Thursday, where the district plans to inform parents about the decisions. "We're going to be calling parents to let them know," said Mejia. Parents will be notified via the district's home page and phone calls. District officials will also direct students to school calendars. "We'll also have a communication plan on what is happening, what's going to happen and what we are doing to prepare," Mejia said. Tampa Bay remains on alert for the virus. Florida Gov. Ron DeSantis announced Wednesday that he is closing all non-essential businesses and issuing an executive order placing a moratorium on all gatherings of 250 people or more. Stevenson said the district also would take that action. The district is in close contact with administrators and board members at the district

Q: How to make a program launch on startup for only a select program in mac os x 10.7.4? I'm new to mac os x development. I have a few programs which launch on startup on my mac os x. Is it possible to make a program launch on startup for only a select program in mac os x? The reason why I want this is that I want to make some adjustments to some programs before I use them and I don't want the adjustments to be applied to all of the programs. A: Yes, that is possible, but it is complicated. You will want to create a LaunchDaemon, and you can find several tutorials online if you search. I will give you a few links to help you get started, but you will probably want to read more up on the topic. Here are some tutorials: There are also tools that will help you out if you are comfortable with applescript and find the process difficult: There are lots of other articles you can find. I suggest starting with one of the links above and then reading further online about the topic. Good luck! Pronounced nucleation and coalescence of supersaturation droplets in reactive interfaces: A local density functional theory and kinetic Monte Carlo study. We investigate the nucleation and growth of liquid droplets of a reactive species in model colloid-polymer-oil interfaces by combining local density functional theory and kinetic Monte Carlo simulations. We determine the nucleation and growth barriers by calculating the equilibrium free-energy of the model colloid-polymer-oil system as a function of the 2d92ce491b
