The present invention relates to garments, and more particularly, to a turban cap. A hat is a garment which is used to protect the head from rain, snow, hot sun, and other elements. It is well known to cover the head with such a hat, but hats have various deficiencies. When exposed to rain and moisture, hats can become quite wet and the head can become chilled and uncomfortable. Hats can and often do slip down over the ears of the wearer, making the head very uncomfortable, and leaving the wearer's hair wet. Caps which cover the head may be waterproof but generally fail to keep the hair dry. Often, a wearer wearing a hat may be required to pull the hat back out of the way, making it inconvenient to wear. Various devices have been developed to provide comfort and protection to the wearer, including sun visors, caps, and visor and/or cap covers, but these devices generally fail to protect the ears and hair of the wearer. For example, prior sun visors and caps have included grommets along the lower edge of the visor to hold the visor in place. However, the lower edge of a visor or cap may be wet, making it uncomfortable for a wearer, and causing problems with the visor or cap slipping off the head. Also, prior caps and sun visors have generally included a headband or
