Q: Windows Server 2003 DNS fails after Rebooting when DNS is not used on the network We have a Windows Server 2003 Server that is used as a domain controller. The server has 1 IP address on the network (192.168.1.101), and our domain name is testing.example.com. I have 2 other servers on this network, one is a Windows 2003 Server that runs DNS and one is a Windows 2008 Server. Our domain name is hosted on a public DNS host. The problem is the DNS server is having issues when it reboots. During the reboot, the domain controller fails to get an IP address via DHCP. The DHCP is enabled on the DNS server, and there are no problems with the DHCP on the other servers. If I log in to the DNS server, everything works fine, it picks up the IP addresses via DHCP. After the reboot, the DNS server can't pick up the IP address. It's as if the server has stopped functioning until I log in. So when I reboot the DNS server, the DHCP server does not restart. Can anyone help with this? A: I'm not sure this will fix your problem, but you can try this workaround: Stop DNS service on the DC. Delete the registry entry HKLM\SYSTEM\CurrentControlSet\Services\DNS\Parameters. Start DNS service on the DC. A: As others have suggested, use DNS to update your internal DNS records rather than rebooting your DC. This is more reliable and scalable. DNS configuration is usually something that you want to avoid rebooting for if at all possible, especially if you're using FQDNs. I would advise against
