As a matter of fact, the SSAT test book for December 17 is now available for $70 at the test center in San Jose, California. As a former SSAT test-taker myself, I think it's safe to say that test prep is hard work, and part of that process involves staying organized throughout the year. One easy way to stay on track is to use a custom test-preparation schedule. Here are a few of my favorite scheduling tools: Customized test-preparation schedule. In order to create a good test-preparation schedule for January, first you need to identify all the topics you wish to practice. This will be easy, since you will already have an outline and list of topics for the year. Once you have your test-preparation schedule, download a copy of the relevant test-preparation schedule for each day, and print it out. If you have several print copies, stack them up and clip them together, or put them in a binder with elastic bands.

Test-preparation schedule. Next, you need to organize your test-preparation schedule, and this is where custom scheduling software can really help. For example, you can use the summary scores section of the software to identify the topics you wish to focus on for the month. As you practice each topic, record a progress note to keep track of your progress, noting the number of problems you've completed. Finally, after the end of the month, delete all your progress notes from the software, and then go back and re-schedule your practice. Pay attention to your practice schedule. When you are testing, you are trying to put your knowledge to the test, and one easy way to do this is to pay attention to your schedule. For example, if you notice that your practice time has become inconsistent, you can use that as a prompt to re-organize your schedule. Make it easy to stay focused. Another way to keep on
