For example, we can estimate a one-year subscription for the upgrade fee at $3,000 at a retail price of $20,000. - Risk of choice. A subscription gives us the flexibility to choose when and how we learn new skills or expand our existing skills, and lets us focus on what is important to us. However, it does come with risks such as the need for many skills to be developed and a risk of further unlearning. - Reliance on free time and on-demand learning. While we do not have to choose when and where to learn, we need to be available on the days, at the time, and at the place our instructor prefers. - Inability to switch to a self-directed path. Due to the subscription model, we are locked into a training course at a fixed price. However, we can only progress as far as the course provides content. If we want to progress to the next course, we will need to pay to upgrade our subscription, even if the previous course was sufficient for our needs. - Dependence on curriculum. Because the curriculum is fixed, a self-directed learner will not have the same access to the information, skills, and competencies as they would have in a self-directed learning process. However, the advantage of a fixed curriculum is that we have access to most of the content, even when we are not enrolled in the course. Case Study {#Sec2} ===== The problems we face in the community health sector are multifaceted. They range from providing timely and effective patient care to addressing the social determinants of health and preventing illness. They also include managing the complexities of health care systems in low- and middle-income countries (LMICs), such as competing funding models, limited resources, poor infrastructure, and inadequate technology. Because of these challenges, community health workers (CHWs) and public health nurses (PHNs) are required to fill many roles that they may not be adequately trained to perform \[@CR3]. For example, they provide immunizations, contraceptive services, and other health interventions to patients, they educate patients about how to take their medications, they provide case management services, they monitor patients for complications, and they deliver health-promoting education to communities and patients about diet, exercise, and social determinants of health \[@CR3].
