Vaginal bleeding may occur at any time of the menstrual cycle, but usually begins in the early stages and tends to be intermittent and profuse. Over half of all women will experience some form of menstrual disturbance at some time during their reproductive life. The pain and bleeding may range from normal to moderate intensity, often starting suddenly and accompanied by cramping and nausea. Menorrhagia is the medical term for heavy, frequent, and prolonged menstrual bleeding that interferes with a woman's daily activities. It may be accompanied by pelvic pain, usually at the time of the menses and sometimes for a few days after. Pain may be alleviated with certain medications, such as tricyclic antidepressants, imipramine, dicyclomine, antispasmodics, or antihistamines. Other pharmacologic interventions for heavy menstrual bleeding include the estrogen-containing contraceptive pill, the progestin-containing IUD, and the non-hormonal intrauterine device (IUD). Heavy menstrual bleeding may indicate an underlying cause for which further evaluation is necessary. If you experience heavy bleeding, discuss it with your gynecologist. A family history of heavy menstrual bleeding may indicate hereditary hemorrhagic disorder. The most common of these is inherited coagulation disorder known as von Willebrand disease. Some women may experience heavy, prolonged menstrual bleeding as a result of polycystic ovary syndrome (PCOS). It is thought to be related to the effects of androgens. Menopause is the loss of the menstrual cycles due to decrease in the production of female sex hormones. Menopause is generally accepted to occur when a woman is no longer 2d92ce491b
