OptiCUT Pro 5.20 Crack In its first major immigration-related move, the Trump administration issued new rules Monday that will make it harder for migrants fleeing violence in Central America to seek refuge in the U.S. The Department of Homeland Security said new guidelines will limit asylum claims from immigrants who have come to the U.S. with a "credible fear" of returning home, a threshold that some immigrants must clear to be eligible for deportation proceedings. The new rules take effect immediately, and will be followed by a 90-day comment period before they take full effect. The new rules are a sign of how much the president has sought to crack down on asylum seekers from Central America. After a spike in migrant families crossing the border in recent months, Trump in May moved to curtail asylum claims and dramatically reduce the number of people allowed to remain in the U.S. while their cases are adjudicated. But by one estimate, only about 40 percent of migrants who crossed the border have viable asylum claims. Most of the rest, the administration says, were clearly fraudulently seeking refuge in the U.S., a claim that
