This is an internal module that does not have a COM port number. To use it, you must have the RH-Int-2-Text System; it is included in the more complex system of modules that make up the RH-Int-2-Ascii System. In the program Window that contains the module, you can type a series of ascii characters. Then click the Read Text button, and watch the characters appear in the program window. If you are debugging a program that includes this module, the ascii characters are not displayed in the usual place, the program window. You can observe the ascii characters by reading the program variable text. You can use this module to type any of the ascii characters, and view the results in the usual place, the program window. SynthEdit.Extras module supports two built-in parameters. RH-Sys.Alt-Char-Break: This parameter controls the speed of the PC speaker that will beep when the mouse is pressed. If the mouse is not pressed, the PC speaker plays the beep that is the default for the PC speaker when the mouse is not pressed. If this parameter is set, then the PC speaker stops beeping when the mouse is pressed. RH-Sys.Change-Symbol: This parameter controls the method of changing symbols. When this parameter is set to use a symbol change key, the new symbol is displayed when you press the corresponding key. When this parameter is set to use a function key, the new function is displayed when you press the corresponding key. When this parameter is set to use a keystroke, you can press any key on the keyboard to change the symbol. You can use any of the standard keys on the keyboard, to change the symbol. If you use the RH-Sys.Change-Symbol parameter, then you can also use the standard symbols keys, to change the symbol. For example, the Ctrl-Alt-F1 command can be used to switch the symbol from symbol A to symbol N. However, there is a difference in the way that the RH-Sys.Change-Symbol parameter works. When the RH-Sys.Change-Symbol parameter is set to use a symbol change key, the program window does not display
