I have a class Base, and I would like to have 3 classes (A, B, C) inherit from it. Is it OK if only class B and C inherit from class Base, and class A doesn't? A:

Is it OK if only class B and C inherit from class Base, and class A doesn't? Sure, but you can add "public" to all of them if you want. If I want to call a method that is in class Base from class B, B and C, what is the most natural/idiomatic way to do it? What if i want to access properties or variables of the Base class from either of these classes? If you haven't applied the Liskov substitution principle, you should absolutely not access "protected" base class properties/variables from classes that inherit from the base class. If the base class and the derived class both use the "protected" members (and have access to it), then the derived class should use it as well. If the base class is public and the derived class is private (or "internal"), then the derived class should use it as well. Here are some useful links for you to read up:
