We have developed a novel electrochemical sensor based on surface immobilization of cationic copolymer beads (CEAB). These copolymer beads were prepared via surface-initiated atom transfer radical polymerization of styrene and 4-vinyl pyridine by successive cationization of the polystyrene and then macro-radical copolymerization. Copolymer beads contained from 4 to 20 mol% 4-vinyl pyridine, a cationic comonomer. Various amount of immobilized DNA were determined by application of the developed sensor method. The optimum copolymer concentration for DNA immobilization is 12 mM. The detection limit of DNA is estimated to be 14 pM. Furthermore, the recovery of 20 ng of salmon sperm DNA was 100%. The present invention is generally directed to a device and method for controlling the density of a froth or slurry, which has been generated during wastewater treatment. In particular, the present invention is directed to a thermal neutron absorber, which is added to wastewater influent in a wastewater treatment facility, or to a discharged effluent during the wastewater treatment process, and which causes froth to be generated so that it can be readily separated from the liquid phase. Wastewater effluent is generated by a variety of industrial and residential processes that discharge a waste stream into a treatment facility where the wastewater is usually subjected to a treatment process (i.e., filtration, sedimentation, and/or a biological process) before the effluent is discharged into a local or regional receiving stream, such as a public waterway or potable water supply system. It is important to these treatment facilities to reduce as much as possible the concentration of organic and inorganic pollutants in the effluent before it is discharged. Reducing these pollutants reduces the amount of treated wastewater that must be discharged into nearby receiving waters, and reduces the amount of associated toxic

Image copyright Lucas van Amstel Image caption In his first post-dodging the final, Lucas van Amstel, who recently triumphed in the men's individual sprint event, looks ahead to his next event at the IPC Athletics World Championships in Berlin Lucas van Amstel has admitted he was "a little bit scared" of the Olympic opening ceremony, having undergone four hours of laser eye surgery to avoid missing the show. But the Dutchman, who had been aiming to compete at the Games, said he had no regrets about staying home. "I'm an athlete and that's what I wanted to do, to do what I wanted to do with my life," he told BBC Sport. "I was disappointed, but I accept it. It's history, we're moving forward." The 26-year-old revealed last month that he had been given an "all clear" to compete, and had undergone the cutting laser treatment just before the beginning of competition in Rio. His dramatic no-show at the Games meant he missed out on winning gold in the men's 4x100m and 4x400m relay, as well as his maiden victory in the men's individual sprint. Nevertheless, the Dutchman remained cheerful and positive about his future prospects. "We're moving forward, with sport being one big brotherhood. My experience at this Olympics will be an experience for the rest of my life," he added. 3e33713323
