Patterns of development in the non-human primate. Much of what we know about the earliest developmental processes has been derived from experiments on the rhesus monkey. These studies have revealed a wealth of information on the sequence of events during the development of the nervous system, the digestive system, and the somatic and reproductive systems. A great deal of information has also been gathered on the effects of prenatal and early postnatal events on the development of these systems. Although much of this has been based on results from experiments on monkeys, there are increasing data from animals with other evolutionary relationships that are being used to provide information on homologous systems. In the case of the nervous system, as well as for the digestive and reproductive systems, the similarities between the non-human primate and man are such that it is likely that much of what has been obtained from studies on monkeys will be applicable to humans. It is probable that the process of neurogenesis will also proceed much the same in man and the non-human primate. As in the human, early events in brain development will most likely influence later development and this will be important in the design of therapies for a variety of developmental anomalies.

E. Abstract Objective. To identify genes that may be associated with salt sensitivity and/or blood pressure level in a Japanese population.Design. Unrelated Japanese individuals were used in the study. They had no apparent risk for salt-sensitive hypertension. Individuals with hypertension were divided into two groups; those in the high blood pressure group had diastolic blood pressure of 90 mmHg or more and those in the low blood pressure group had diastolic blood pressure less than 90 mmHg. Sodium chloride solution was administered orally to study the differences in blood pressure response. Genes known to be related to hypertension and/or salt sensitivity were studied.Methods. DNA samples were analyzed for several polymorphisms of the candidate genes using PCR-based assays.Results. Higher levels of sodium and chloride in urine were associated with a blunted blood pressure response to a high sodium load in the low blood pressure group. Two polymorphisms of the ANGPTL4 gene were significantly associated with the blood pressure response to high salt intake. The -1754C/A (rs7675 (G>A)) polymorphism was found in 8.9% of the high blood pressure group, but in none of the low blood pressure group. The -924C/T (rs2073547) polymorphism was found in 7.6% of the high blood pressure group, but in none of the low blood pressure group.Conclusion. These data suggest that ANGPTL4 might be a candidate gene for salt-sensitive hypertension and that the polymorphism of ANGPTL4 may influence salt sensitivity.Ludovic Julien Ludovic Julien (born 27 February 1981 in Dreux, France) is a French former footballer.
