The presence of a leukemogenic oncogene on chromosome 15 in some chronic myelocytic leukemia patients. We studied the frequency of the c-abl-specific breakpoints, chromosome 15q22.2-q23.1, in 19 patients with Ph1-positive chronic myelocytic leukemia (CML). In all cases, the breakpoints were detected by Southern blot analysis in combination with genetic analysis with a panel of polymorphic markers. A high proportion of CML patients (12/19, 63.2%) had a breakpoint on 15q22.2-q23.1. These results were confirmed by fluorescence in situ hybridization analysis, which demonstrated that the region of chromosome 15, 15q22.2-q23.1, was present in a single copy in all patients. In addition, all of the patients with a 15q22.2-q23.1 breakpoint had a duplication of 15q11.2-q13, and most had an additional marker deletion. The presence of a c-abl-specific breakpoint on chromosome 15 is not restricted to the classic Ph1-positive translocation but is present in a considerable number of patients with
