(Photo by Rob Haynes via Wikimedia Commons) If there's anything that's conspicuously missing from the U.S. health care debate, it's a spotlight on the impact of the U.S. health care system on the people whose lives it affects. It's too easy to reduce U.S. health care reform to slogans like "If you like your insurance you can keep your insurance" or "If you like your doctor, you can keep your doctor." As a result, the Affordable Care Act can be seen as just one more thing on an ever-growing list of "improvements" that will be added to the Affordable Care Act. But as we've heard all week, the Affordable Care Act is not just one thing. It's a sweeping overhaul of our health care system, one that will affect the lives of more people than just the 30 million who are insured. The Affordable Care Act will provide health insurance to everyone who wants it. But it will also bring sweeping changes to the health care system in our country. For example, the Affordable Care Act will end the practice of insurance companies denying coverage to people with pre-existing conditions. Insurance companies have abused the coverage process for years by refusing to offer insurance to people with pre-existing conditions, so they ended up having to settle with the states for billions of dollars. The new law will allow every person in the country to get health insurance — regardless of their health history. And states will be required to set up marketplaces where people who can't afford coverage will be able to shop for coverage. Another big change will come from the Medicare reforms. Medicare is the health insurance program for older Americans. Before the Affordable Care Act, many seniors couldn't buy Medicare directly from private insurance companies. If they wanted to buy Medicare, they had to enroll in an HMO — a private insurance company that was part of a larger insurance company. And
