Have you ever seen the sequence of events that a broken robot will follow after it is not able to find any power cables? It starts walking backward and slowly backing away from the spot on which it is placed. It eventually starts falling over as it fails to get out of its own generated circle of gravity. And finally, after what seems like an eternity, it stops and stops at its maximum liftoff distance. In the case of the repair shop robot, it would mean hanging in a place of low ambient temperature to complete the job. That is not good at all. We all think that the repair shop should be a relatively cool place. Not only that, but some of our shops are unusually hot or cold. And when the repair job is a refrigeration job, then the repair shop needs to be cold for proper work to be done. This would mean that some part of the building needs to be air-conditioned or installed with reverse cycle refrigeration systems. 09e8f5149f
