larry814.Prognostic factors after surgical treatment of trochanteric fractures. Two hundred twenty-nine cases of trochanteric fractures of the femur were reviewed to determine the influence of the time between injury and surgery on the results of operative treatment. There were 22 late-presenting and 206 early-presenting fractures. Fifty-seven femoral components were removed, and 135 femoral components were retained. The remaining trochanteric fragment was usually retained in the femur, particularly for early-presenting fractures. The incidence of deep infection was higher among patients operated on 4 days or more after injury than among patients operated on within 1 day after injury (25% vs 10%). There was a strong association between increased time after injury and increased complication rate, including extension of the infection./
