A large proportion of human cancers are preceded by a prolonged preneoplastic phase during which the cells acquire properties that predispose them to the malignant phenotype. Unfortunately, most of these precancerous lesions are difficult to recognize, especially early in their development. Some of the molecular events taking place early in the development of cervical intraepithelial neoplasia (CIN) and cervical carcinoma are discussed. In this discussion, it is emphasized that the basis for the understanding of these molecular events is the discovery of disease-associated genes that have a role in transformation of normal cells to cancer. This has resulted in the identification of a family of genes, called oncogenes, that are essential to the neoplastic process. Q: Move element to beginning and end of array in PHP without recreating I have the following array: $a = array("1", "2", "3", "4"); What I would like to be able to do is to move the "2" element to the start and the "4" element to the end of the array. This should result in: $a = array("1", "2",
