Clinical analysis of gastric lymphoma with special reference to diffuse histiocytic sarcoma. We report the clinical course of 18 cases of gastric lymphoma. Patients ranged in age from 3 to 56 years, and 3 patients (16.7%) were under 15 years old. Nine (50%) of the patients had had an enlargement of the mass for more than 2 months. The results of various laboratory examinations were normal. Epigastric discomfort was found in 16 (88.9%) of the cases, and the masses were detected by endoscopy in 16 (88.9%) of the cases. Nine (50%) of the patients had elevated blood LDH levels. In 6 of the patients (33.3%), dyspepsia, nausea, and vomiting were complained of. Eight (44.4%) of the patients suffered from the symptoms and signs of hypoproteinemia. Generalized edema was found in 1 (5.6%) of the cases. Histologically, 1 case (5.6%) each was diagnosed as gastric lymphoma of MALT (mucosa-associated lymphoid tissue), low grade and lymphoblastic lymphoma, respectively. All of the patients were treated by surgical excision. Two patients had early local recurrence, one in the gastric wall and another in the omentum. The remaining 16 patients are alive without any signs of recurrence. Two patients who were treated with surgical excision in good condition died suddenly of disseminated intravascular coagulopathy. Past, Present, and Future of Space Exploration on October 6, 2019 The history of mankind has been marked by the expansion of our knowledge and exploration of the cosmos. From the ancient Egyptians and their great achievement of creating the first known maps, to the Chinese, Russian and American space explorers, space exploration has been a driving force of human progress. A 2014 Gallup poll found that over 80 percent of the world's population supported human exploration of space, and sentiment is still strong among Americans. In fact, 72 percent of the American people expressed that they would pay to have access to space. So what lies ahead for exploration? NASA has laid out its strategy, driven by the ability to sustain human life on the planet, as well as maintain a safe, flourishing home for future generations. It is the realization of the challenges we have encountered as a species and the fears we continue to carry as individuals today: pollution, climate change, space weather, extreme weather, and the hidden perils of human interaction — from war to political turmoil. The risks and consequences of these risks to our global, technological society are becoming more evident with each passing day. For some, the reality of these issues has spurred the thinking and activism that has been known as the “space movement.” Importantly, many of the benefits of space exploration have been the result of private initiative, the first being the practical result of the utility of the study of the stars. In Europe, research contributed to seafaring and eventually the discovery of the Americas and the bounty of precious stones mined from planet earth. In the United States, the industrial era spawned the bold, experimental belief of our founding fathers that man could conquer the heavens. The wake-up call to developing our understanding of the planets' atmosphere prompted the development of the Apollo program and ushered in the age of space exploration. The research into climate change prompted the creation of the Internet, which has been a boon to global economic integration. The communications revolution sparked the spread of democracy across the world, and industry has revolutionized all aspects of life through the ability to broadcast audio and video. Today, we are far from declaring war or embarking on an apocalyptic confrontation with nature. We should be encouraged by the advances in technology that have brought such profound social transformation, yet only the future will fully measure the success of space exploration. Both American and European space exploration represents a dramatic and thrilling era in the history of our species. In a way, space exploration is simply mankind
