Likewise, the `_white point_` is the darkest point that's pure white. The `_black point_`, `_white point_`, and `_midpoint_` are the `_black/white_` or `_black/white/midpoint levels_` — and you use them to make levels in your image. In the left half of Figure 19-2, you see a gray-scale image with no adjustment. In the right half, you see that if you click anywhere within that image, a black point (green arrow) and white point (purple arrow) are indicated in the Layers palette. Keep in mind that a midpoint (orange arrow) is also indicated, but it's not the same thing as a midpoint level. Remember also that you can create a midpoint by holding the `Ctrl/Option` key while creating the points (green arrow). FIGURE 19-2: The result of selecting a different area of an image using levels. When a point is clicked, the current brightness is labeled at the bottom of the Layers palette. The change in brightness is indicated by the `_plus_` or `_minus_` signs. In Figure 19-2, you can see that changing the pointer from the black point (green) to the white point (purple) changes the brightness of the image. This kind of change is commonly used for adjusting whites and blacks. You can create a midpoint in color by holding down the `Ctrl/Option` key while creating the points (green arrow). In the Layers palette, you can adjust the levels by setting points

Expression of heat shock protein 70 and apoptosis in tumour and non-tumour areas of human colorectal carcinoma. Heat shock protein 70 (HSP70) is involved in the early stages of apoptosis, and its levels are markedly increased in apoptotic cells. This study investigates the relationship of HSP70 expression in the tumour and non-tumour areas of colorectal carcinomas and their correlation with the apoptosis index. Immunohistochemistry was performed on 21 colorectal carcinomas to investigate the expression of HSP70 in non-tumour and tumour areas as well as to estimate the apoptosis index. Significant increase of HSP70 expression was observed in colorectal carcinomas when compared with normal mucosa. HSP70 was expressed in both cytoplasm and nucleus. There was a statistically significant increase of HSP70 expression in tumour areas compared with non-tumour areas. There was no statistical difference in the apoptosis index of the non-tumour areas and the tumour areas. The results suggest that HSP70 might be associated with the progression of the tumour.
