Studio. Tryptophan hydroxylase (Tph1) gene deletion in mice: impaired serotonin synthesis and behavioral effects associated with a differential action of the serotonin system on hippocampal neurotransmission. Tryptophan hydroxylase (Tph) is the rate-limiting enzyme that catalyzes

the initial step of serotonin synthesis. We generated a mouse line lacking the expression of Tph1 gene by homologous recombination in embryonic stem cells. A 15-kb fragment was targeted, resulting in the replacement of a larger region of Tph1 sequence by a neomycin resistance cassette. This replacement led to deletion of the majority of the gene. Lack of Tph1 mRNA in brain and lack of activity of the enzyme were demonstrated by in situ hybridization and by measuring enzyme activity in brain extracts, respectively.

Spontaneous locomotor activity and acoustic startle response were not altered in homozygous mice, whereas response to a novel environment was reduced in heterozygous mice, as compared with heterozygous wild-type littermates. In contrast, heterozygous mice did not exhibit a difference as compared with wild-type mice in concentrations of serotonin in brain, although they showed a trend towards lower values. In vitro superfusion experiments were performed to characterize the functional consequences of a defect in Tph function on the two main neuronal targets of serotonin, the hippocampus and the dorsal raphe nucleus (DRN). Tph1-deficient mice showed significantly less 5-hydroxytryptamine overflow and significantly less inhibition of K(+)-stimulated glutamate release in the hippocampus. In contrast, in the DRN, 5-hydroxytryptamine release and the inhibitory action of serotonin on

K(+)-stimulated release were not impaired, and no changes were observed in glutamate release. These findings suggest that Tph1 is
