In den nachfolgenden Anlagen finden Sie. was ausgemacht worden ist.pdf, Here's something you don't hear very often: If you're pregnant and working, it's actually better for you. That's the takeaway from a study published in the Annals of Internal Medicine. Researchers found that pregnant women who continue to work are not more likely to suffer certain stress-related illnesses than those who choose to take time off. Efforts to understand the effects of stress on pregnancy outcomes "are in their infancy," but it turns out that for most women it's fine to stick with your job during pregnancy. "As a new mother myself, we can only imagine how much stress and uncertainty many pregnant women experience," study author Susan K. Lown, of the Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health, said in a statement. "The results of this study are encouraging because it shows that we do not need to ignore maternal responsibility in our desire to protect mothers and their children from stress." She added: "Healthy work conditions could have an enormous positive impact on women's ability to provide for their families during pregnancy and subsequently."
