Bariatric surgery: are we preventing the development of acute kidney injury? The current management of acute kidney injury (AKI) in the bariatric surgery population is lacking. Recent evidence suggests that AKI is an early complication of bariatric surgery and may be associated with increased risks of subsequent ischemia-reperfusion and/or inflammatory injury. The formation of new AKI is primarily a result of an imbalance in the fibrinolytic pathway, secondary to reduced net fibrinolytic capacity. The formation of AKI after bariatric surgery may be theoretically preventable with earlier institution of limited surgical procedures (smaller stomach with gastric bypass, resection of body fat and the resulting abdominal adipose tissue with restrictive procedures) and with the use of fibrinolytic agents and anti-inflammatory agents.
