in regards to mental health, crack users with a past arrest history were more likely to report mental health problems. additionally, crack users with a history of arrest were more likely to report being arrested than those who did not have a history of arrest. those who used crack by smoking were more likely to report a past arrest and mental health problems than those who used crack by snorting. however, when it came to arrest, the routes of administration did not predict whether the person would be arrested or not. the researchers found that crack users were more likely to be in the higher risk category for arrest and incarceration than powder cocaine users. of those who reported lifetime use of crack, 42% were in the high-risk category, compared to 19% of those who reported lifetime use of powder cocaine. crack users were also more likely to be unemployed, homeless, and to have had a mental health problem. crack users were also more likely to have a past arrest history and mental health problems than powder cocaine users. however, the crack-powder disparity in sentencing remains. the african american community, which is largely impoverished and unemployed, is particularly affected by the disparity, as crack is more often associated with poverty and unemployment than powder cocaine. currently, the crack sentencing disparity is at 18 to one, while the powder cocaine sentencing disparity is at 1 to 1. the first step in reducing the crack sentencing disparity is to eliminate mandatory minimum sentences. courts should have the discretion to tailor each case to its specific circumstances, and instead of a rigid 15-year sentence, offenders should be given an opportunity to receive probation and treatment. states should eliminate the use of a one-size-fits-all crack-powder sentencing ratio and instead should allow judges to make their own sentencing decisions.

need for research: research is needed to better understand the health outcomes of crack use. "we need studies in the clinical sphere to determine the best treatment strategies for patients addicted to crack," says dr. palamar. results: of 50 studies, five met eligibility criteria, with one meta-analysis including 28 studies. the epidemiology of crack use is similar to that of cocaine. however, crack is a more potent drug, and the health consequences of use are more serious. cocaine users are more likely to experience depression, anxiety, suicidal thoughts, psychotic disorders, and paranoia. crack users are likely to have hepatitis c, other sexually transmitted diseases, and hiv. "the main health outcome for crack use is the same as for cocaine use," says dr. palamar. "we have to figure out the best ways to help them." costs of treatment: treatment is not well reimbursed. most medicaid programs do not cover outpatient treatment for crack addiction, and only a few insurers cover
