The prevalence of obsessive-compulsive disorder (OCD) has been reported to be significantly higher among patients treated with atypical neuroleptics. Atypical neuroleptics include tiapride, quetiapine, aripiprazole, and ziprasidone. Neuroleptics have been used for the treatment of anxiety disorders, primarily OCD. Some reports have linked the use of atypical neuroleptics to the development of OCD in neuroleptic-naïve patients. There are reports on OCD in patients treated with atypical neuroleptics, supporting a causal relationship, but they need to be confirmed. The authors report a case of a 28-year-old man with treatment-resistant OCD, who showed marked improvement with the use of ziprasidone, which was discontinued for 1 week because of adverse events. On discontinuation of ziprasidone, the patient's OCD symptoms, however, remained under control. This suggests that OCD can develop in patients receiving atypical neuroleptics. A case of a 28-year-old man with treatment-resistant OCD was presented for continued unsatisfactory response to multiple trials of serotonin reuptake inhibitor (SRI) antidepressants and antipsychotic medications, with the goal of controlling his symptoms. Despite treatment with several different medications, his OCD symptoms continued to be difficult to control. The patient was clinically stable for more than a year following the discontinuation of his ziprasidone. The patient did not demonstrate any adverse effects after more than 1 week of discontinuation of ziprasidone. The patient subsequently reported that his OCD symptoms had abated to a greater degree after ziprasidone was discontinued. . . ZIP RAR(60Mb) . . RAR FILE. . Setup: ZIP RAR(60MB).
